Start with a sentence.

What the 20,000 means

This is a selection of 20,000 distinct English headwords and forms with Russian dictionary equivalents. Eligible entries are ordered by wordfreq English frequency estimates. Numbers show order within this selection, not universal corpus ranks. It is not a list of the 20,000 most frequent Russian words.

A reference, not a one-to-one translation code

English and Russian divide meanings differently. A short Russian equivalent may fit only one sense. Read the sense note, check context, and look up the whole construction. Verb aspect, motion, animacy, gender, and case all matter. Not every sense or inflection is included.

How to use each entry

Read the English headword and part of speech, then the selected Russian equivalent and English sense clue. Stress marks are kept where the dictionary supplies them; missing stress is not a pronunciation instruction. Search the PDF to find a word. Use the alphabetical index at the end for page numbers.

Build active vocabulary

Choose five useful entries. Make a Russian sentence for each. Check the form in the Russian Cases word workshop, listen to native speech, and revisit the words tomorrow. Recognizing an entry is different from being able to use it.

Editorial limits

This edition is assembled from open dictionary data and automatically prioritized senses, with corrections for common grammatical words. It has not received a full 20,000-entry human linguistic review. Some source entries may be unusual, incomplete, outdated, or contain informal and offensive language. Use a dictionary or teacher to resolve uncertainty. It is not CEFR certification.

An independent edition

This book does not reproduce the ranks, frequencies, collocates, or translations of the Davies and Gardner COCA word-frequency PDF. Its selection and source data are independent.

Built on open knowledge.
